"Old Taneytown" Eastern Section

Next to the brick hotel, and facing on Baltimore St., stood "Ran" Freeling's barber shop. "Ran" would as lief dance as shave a customer, especially after having taken a drink.

Then came the long barn belonging to the hotel stable and a yard in front of it, and solid board fence containing the sign in large letters "Diamond Club" claimed to describe a "pure rye whiskey," following which in order were, the later Burke's Barber Shop, the Municipal building, and the present Clingan's, Dern's and Riffle's buildings.

(The large Central Garage owned by Harold S. Mehring has since been built between the barber shop and the above named buildings.)

We think that the home of the Misses Galt, now owned by Edward S. Harner, came next in order of building, and that George A. Shoemaker next building what is now occupied as the telephone exchange and C. G. Bowers' Store.

The next building was that of George H. Birnie Banker and Broker, on the site of which is the home of B. Walter Crapster, and that the James Reindollar dwelling, now owned by Claudius H. Long, on the corner of Baltimore and Middle St. (We are not sure that sequence of the erection of these buildings, is correct.)

Whether to continue the eastern section, or north eastern section of the town, now, or hold it to the mill road boundary, is the question. We believe that it will be best to give a northern section, later.

We therefore go on toward George Street, which means toward the big fire of Friday, Nov. 26, 1897.

The Carroll Record was located on the top floor of what was S. E. Reindollar's warehouse, and the fire commenced in the hay shed end of the Eckenrode warehouse on the north.

The loss to The Record was complete. But in a short while our working force, M. Ross Fair, Curtis H. Reid, with the use of the plant of the Victor Remedies Co., in Frederick, issued The Record regularly, for a time, without delay and later secured another lot of machinery, and first made use of the second floor of the C. E. H. Shriner's harness shop, and Curtis G. Bowers Store as temporary quarters.

The many details of the big fire we are unable to give, but a number of frame buildings on Baltimore Street were destroyed.

We can not follow Middle Street except to say that among its early residents was Wm. Jesse Roberts, the present home of William Feeser; that of George A. Arnold, the present was the home of Levi D. Reid, and farther on down the home of George Overholtzer, the home of John J. Reid until his removal to Detroit, and that of Franklin Bowersox that was part of the big fire. When the U. B. Church was built we do not know.

The home of the Editor is on this street, and the Granger organization occupied the Chas. E. H. Shriner apartment house. The first brick house built on this street was the one now owned by Mrs. Stott and Miss Anna Galt.

As before stated we will later include Fairview Ave. and other northern improvements.

OLD TANEYTOWN 25 YEARS AGO.

(Sept. 15, 1916)

After appropriating nearly two millions of dollars, Congress adjourned.

A splendid program was under preparation at Baptist Reformed Church to be rendered on Rally Day. The services were conducted by Rev. Paul D. Yoder, the pastor, assisted by Dr. Luther Kemp and an orchestra of 10 pieces and a choir of 15 voices.

Editor Wm. L. W. Seabrook of the American Sentinel, Westminster, died, at the age of 82 years.

The compulsory school attendance law was put into effect at this time.

All grain crops were short due to drought.

Kenneth Koutz had his tonsils removed at the Frederick City Hospital. Samuel J. Flickinger was taken to the same hospital for an X-ray photograph of a broken leg.

About 4200 bushels of wheat were brought to the elevators in Taneytown in one morning, making the street present an unusually active appearance. The price paid for wheat was $1.50 per bushel.

The concrete sidewalk from Trinity Lutheran Church to the cemetery was completed. This was the longest piece of cement work done at that time for Taneytown, being 1038 feet, 10 inches long, 4 feet wide, with a gutter extension, requiring about eight days work. The committee in charge of the work was: John S. Bower, David Bachman, L. W. Mehring, Milton Ohler and J. A. P. Garner.

Mary, the 14-year-old daughter by adoption of Mr. and Mrs. Martin D. Hess, was ill with infantile paralysis.

Elizabeth With Variations
 By HOPE RIDER
 (Associated Newspapers—WNU Service.)

AUNT BESSIE said: "No pie." She said it in a way that made me feel that pie was something outrageous. Aunt Bessie was like that. She had a way of saying things, not unkindly, nor very insistently, but definitely, so that they made you feel as if she was right and you were wrong.

It was a good pie—chocolate, with whipped cream on top. And because of what Aunt Bessie said, Jack said, with a glowering eye cocked sidewise at her, "Give me an extra large piece, Elizabeth. It's my favorite dessert." It isn't. As a matter of fact, Jack would rather have apple pie than any other. But chocolate pie fitted into my menu, so I had made it—and it's a lot of work—for this first dinner of Aunt Bessie's with us after her last trip abroad.

"Me, too, mama," said young John. "I want a double order." And that was true. Boy-like, my ten-year-old wants a double order of any pie.

Aunt Bessie looked down her nose at her grandnephew across the table from her. "I hope," she said, "you don't give the baby chocolate pie at this ungodly hour, Bessie?"

"Oh, no," I answered as easily as possible. "Betty, you know, is only three—hardly graduated into the pie class yet. She had her cereal and milk at half past five, in the approved modern fashion, and was asleep by six."

"Yet," said Aunt Bessie, "I don't know that your mother and I suffered because we were brought up in the old fashion, Bessie. We were husky enough. Of course, your mother died when you were a baby—but no kind of food could have saved her from being killed by a runaway horse. I always thought she was a reckless rider."

Well, we were off to a pleasant evening; I could see that. Jack was furious. He bit into his chocolate cream pie so hard that his teeth clicked. John looked eager. I could see that he was planning craftily to get Aunt Bessie to give him a detailed account of the awful accident that had killed my mother before I could really remember her. And I was annoyed, too. Aunt Bessie was in one of her less pleasant moods—she was calling me Bessie.

"Elizabeth," said Jack, sternly, "another piece of pie, please."

There's always been an Elizabeth in our family—in my mother's family, I mean. The name had fallen to Aunt Bessie in her generation, when Bessie was the usual form. I'd been christened Elizabeth, and had kept the name as it was. And we'd given the name to our baby, and of course called her Betty. My grandmother—the mother of my mother and Aunt Bessie—had been called Bess, and her mother had been Lizzie Holden. And there'd been a succession of Bets and Bessies and Lizzies with a Betsy in Revolutionary days—way back to the days of Elizabeth in England, when there had been a Bess Hardwick as one of the good queen's ladies in waiting. We were proud of that ancestor, of course. And it was fun to pass on her name. But I wondered, as I watched Aunt Bessie drink her cup of black coffee if the name had caused as much trouble in the past as it was causing us now.

I really loved Aunt Bessie. She'd been a darling to me always. My father had married again, and, as my stepmother had no place in her plans for a leftover daughter, I had spent my childhood in various schools. With Aunt Bessie as the bright fairy godmother who made life interesting. Summer holidays abroad or in the mountains with her—unexpected Christmas trips to Atlantic City or Bermuda—a convalescence one winter, in Florida, and a lovely winter, out of school, in California. Of course, I loved her. But she was a spoiled sort of woman, nevertheless. Too much money and too little to do.

Now, after an eighteen months' trip around the world, she had come to us for a six weeks' visit. We had really looked forward to it. Jack had planned trips to the theater and dinner in town—"We can't let her think there's nothing worthwhile in this country, Elizabeth," he had said. And I had rounded up a lot of her old friends and planned to have them for cards and luncheons. Little John liked company, and had mapped out picnics to some of his favorite haunts. And Betty seemed to have got it into her head that the aunt who was coming was coming, really, to see her.

"Did you make that pie, Bessie?" asked my aunt.

"Yes."

"Haven't you a maid?"

It was an unnecessary question. Annie had been serving dinner, and very nicely, too. "Yes," I answered. "But she is not an experienced cook. So I do some of the cooking. You know, I learned how at school—at Miss Marken's. And then, I like it, and I've really become quite an expert."

"Oh," said Aunt Bessie. "I've always thought it was more important to learn to cook the plain things well than to waste time on fancy desserts. Pie, for instance—"

Fortunately, she went to bed ear-

WRONG SUGGESTION

The bore had more than outstayed his welcome and at the end of a fortnight, his weary host thought of a sure way, he hoped, to get rid of him.

"Don't you think your wife and family must be lonesome when separated so long from you?" he inquired of the unwanted visitor.

"It had not occurred to me," said the latter, springing to his feet, "thanks for reminding me. I'll use your telephone at once and ask them to drive down and join me here."
