CLOSED IN THE SIXTIES.

Fifteen miles north of here, at the foot of the hills, almost on the line of Clarke and Champaign counties, nestles the quiet, happy quaint little town of Catawba, filled with a quiet, old fashioned, home-loving folk. On arriving there I found a country taveru with "feed stable" attached, and the office was a typical country store, where they sold not only dry goods, clothing, boots and shoes, but also handled groceries, hardware, queensware and kept the post office. The store was filled with the usual number of loafers, "twofers," while others enjoyed a pipe filled with wigwam.

They were awaiting the mail which arrives overland once a day, and talking of Hawaiian annexation and other important events of the day. On entering into their conversation I found that this unassuming little town has a store, and "thereby hangs a tale." On inquiry I found the proprietor of this store lived on his farm near town. He was easily found, however, and readily granted his permission for me to see the place, which was, indeed, the object of my trip. He also consented to go along and take a look at the now deserted but at one time leading store of the place.
