MARGARAT E. SANGSTER. A poor little pale-faced baby, Lost and hungry and cold, wet cheeks And ruffling her bright hair's gold. For just when the busy people Were hurrying here and yon, Buying their gifts for the Christmas tree, Her mother was suddenly gone.

She did not cry, poor midget, But lifted pitiful eyes At the crowds of careless strangers, At the gray indifferent skies. Jostled and pushed and frighted, A tiny waif of the street, With the wintry darkness falling, And the snow-flakes gathering fleet. among them

She was seen by a great kind giant; With swinging stride he came, Even then the angels in heaven Wrote saint before his name. From the height of his splendid stature He stooped to the little maid, Lifted her up in tender arms, And bade her not be afraid.

Against his broad breast nestled, She clung like a soft spring flower That a breeze had caught and carried To a strong and sheltering tower. In his thick warm cloak he wrapped her,

The little shivering child, 'I'll find your mother, baby," The bishop said, and smiled.

'Tis but a memory dim, For the years are hastening onward, And we are mourning him. The cold white snows are drifting Where to-day he lies asleep, After his life's long warfare The soldier's rest is deep.

But of dear things said about him, Of victories that he won. No sweeter tale is told than this Of his grace to a little one.

A GEORGIA HANGING.

Paul Bourget Tells How a Negro Murderez Met Death on the Gallows.

"Are you ready, Henry?" "Yes, captain," replied the young man. "Just hand me that cigar and light it for me." So writes Paul Bourget in the Boston Herald in describing the hanging of a negro murderer in Georgia.

The old man placed between his lips the half of a cigar which had been carefully deposited upon a wooden shelf in the cell. The first half of this Havana, which had been given him by some charitable visitor, had appeared so delicious to Seymour that he had saved the second in order to obtain a little agreeable sensation before dying. It was his adieu to life, to his life, that was represented by the few puffs which he inhaled as he descended the staircase. When the door of the courtyard opened and he saw the scaffold to prove that he had also nerves to conquer. He dominated them immediately, for he ascended the few the infamy of a public execution,

"Nothing, captain," replied the condemned man without a movecalm.

"Say, O Saviour, remember me in thy kingdom?" cried a loud voice at my side, the voice of the colonel.

"Saviour, remember me in thy kingdom!" repeated the lisping voice of the mulatto. Then, after a little silence, "I'm all right now," with great firmness. "Goodby, captain," he added, addressing the sheriff. "Goodby, everybody. Goodby, colonel."

Quite instinctively we all cried, "Goodby, Henry," and the colonel, louder than the others: "Goodby, my boy. Goodby, my boy," he repeated, and at that very instant the sheriff separated the cord that held tho plank with one stroke of his ax. How to Study German.

The study of German is by no means so simple a matter as the words might imply, writes Professor A. S. Isaacs of the University of New York, giving some valuable advice under the title "When Studying German' in The Ladies' Home Journal. It may signify a mere reading circulated and widely read newspaper published in Pennsylvania. Its distribution of the language or the knowledge of the language or the most thorough acquaintance with its literature and ability to speak it with absolute fluency and idiomatic accuracy. Naturally the methods of study will vary according to the purpose in view and the age and acquirements of the student. There is no royal road to the study of German or any language, however glowing are the predictions of some teachers and anticipations of credulous pupils. Success in language study depends upon the student's ambition, industry and ability. It is less a question of teacher or textbook, although these are not to be despised. But, as in everything in life, success must be earned in language study by earnest, well directed and systematic individual effort.
