A Visitor to the "House."

The man who yisits, for the first time, our National House of Reprebeing edified as to what is going on, is likely to be greatly disappointed; at least, he will know decidedly more if he waits until the next day and reads the newspapers, unless he is, indeed, a superior sort of person, with unusually acute hearing and perceptive powers.

The idea that the House is a dignified, orderly and deliberate body, in its usual routine, is wholly erroneous. At least, it appears so to the galleries. Probably half of the members, during session, are on their feet, moying back and forth, holding consultations, or probably telling yarns. A fair percentage of the other half is writing or reading, and, except something of unusual importance has the floor, but yery few members seem to take any account whatever of the proceedings.
