POOR TIRED MOTHER.

They were talking of the glory of the land beyond the skies, Of the light and of the gladness to be found in paradise, Of the flowers ever blooming, of the never-closing songs, Of the wand'ring through the golden streets of happy, white-robed throngs; And said father, leaning cozily back in his easy-chair, (Father always was a master-hand for comfort every where); "What a joyful thing 't would be to know that when this life is o'er One would straightway hear a welcome from the blessed shining shore!" And Isabel, her eldest girl, glanced upward from the bed. She was painting on a water jug, and murmured, "Yes, indeed." And Marian, the next in age, a moment dropped her book, And, "Yes, indeed!" repeated, with a most ecstatic look. But mother, gray-haired mother, who had come to sweep the room, With a patient smile on her thin face, leaned lightly on her broom— "Poor mother! no one ever thought how much she had to do— And said: "I hope it is not wrong not to agree with you, But seems to me that when I die, before I join the blest, I'd like just for a little while to lie in my grave and rest." —Margaret Eytinge, in Harper's Magazine

A MITE SONG.

Only a drop in the bucket, But every drop will tell; The bucket would soon be empty Without the drops in the well.

Only a poor little penny; It was all I had to give; But as pennies make the dollars, It may help some cause to live.

A few little bits of ribbon And some toys; they were not new, But they made the sick child happy, Which has made me happy too.

Only some outgrown garments; They were all I had to spare; But they'll help to clothe the needy, And the poor are everywhere.

God loveth the cheerful giver, Though the gift be poor and small; What doth He think of His children When they never give at all.

A TERRIBLE RIDE.

A DETECTIVE'S STORY.

If two persons, from the fact of having met before, might disperse with the ceremony of introduction in nine cases out of ten, my readers would not need a word of preface from me, but would be content with my proceeding with my story at once. In fact, I shall do so, after a brief description of myself, not as I am, but as it is my wont to appear in public.

Are you living in the country? Then the chances are that at a not very remote hour you may have seen prowling about the neighborhood a man who might have been a tramp, a bricklayer out of work, an expungist, a dog stealer—any one or all of these, as his dress would present such a strange combination as to utterly confound your attempt to guess the particular grade to which the stranger belonged. That man was Detective Trace.

Are you a resident of the West end, who know by heart the faces of those whom you meet during your promenades in Regent street and the parks? If so, you have perhaps seen a man who has puzzled you—a "well" faultlessly "got up," as to his dress, and with a profuse yet quiet display of jewelry. You may have noticed that, whilst he apparently participated in the pleasures of the gay crowd of idlers, his eye was restless, and failed not to scan the features of every masculine and feminine face that passed him, and this too without the slightest approach to rudeness; and your keen eye detected that his jewels were paste, and you could not, do what you would, "make him out." He was Detective Trace.

Does your business ever carry you through the purlieus of St. Giles, or the foul courts and alleys of White-chapel? If I may take it for granted that such is the case, you will perhaps remember noticing during your progress a man who apparently did not know what to do with himself—a down cast looking fellow hanging round the door of a public-house or a gin palace, with his hands deep in the pockets of a pair of greasy corduroys and his chin half hidden in a gaudy "Belcher" neckerchief, whilst he passed the time by puffing dense clouds of smoke from a short black pipe. He did not trouble you much, however; you simply said to yourself, "Some poor fellow out of work." But you were wrong. He was Detective Trace.

Whether you are of the town or country, you have, I presume, travelled by railway, and have sometimes found your vis-a-vis an affable loquacious old gentleman with spectacles, who rested his palms on the handle of a stout stick or umbrella, whilst he quietly scrutinized and bandied an inoffensive joke with each passenger who entered or left the carriage at the different stations, and who, in spite of a troublesome asthmatical cough, so managed to ingratiate himself with his fellow-travellers as to almost draw from them the history of their travels for any past period. Perhaps it has also been your lot to see this same agreeable old gentleman condescend to a sudden fit of seriousness as he whispered in the ear of one of the occupants of the compartment who was going to alight. This may have surprised you; but what followed this strange movement gave you a clue to the mystery. You witnessed an alteration, followed by the sharp click of handcuffs, and you know that he was Detective Trace.

May be at times you have had a difficulty in killing a weary hour or so, and have amused yourself by listening to the "cases" at the nearest police court. If so, your eye has wandered to the witness box as the officer in charge of the culprit has entered it. Whom did you see there? A man who no longer hoisted false colors, for there was no further need of disguise; he had thrown it aside, and stood revealed in his true character, wearing the uniform of a sergeant in the police force, as having kissed the Sacred Book, he proceeded at once to tell "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," at which, and gave in his name as Sergeant Trace. But, although he has long been superannuated and the winter of time has somewhat thinned and silvered his hair, his evidence, whilst he reclines in his easy chair, shall be as true, the fact which he asserts shall be as irrefragable, as when years ago he kissed the Sacred Book in the court over which the blind goddess presides.

To begin then—Sergeant Trace and I are one and the same person. Many years ago I was instructed to discover the whereabouts of a young lady who was "wanted"—why, it is unnecessary for me to tell; but it was in the execution of my duty that an incident occurred which nearly cost me my life.

I had tracked the fugitive to Brighton, where I made the discovery that she was just upon the point of returning to London. This suitably admirably; I could delay the disagreeable business of arrest till we arrived at the end of the journey; but, in order to be upon the safe side, I, of course, did not lose sight of her, and finally seated myself in the same compartment of the train as she herself occupied.

It was the morning express, and our compartment contained but three passengers, a gentleman, a lady—the object of my pursuit—and myself. The guard locked the door, and then commented the most terrible journey I ever made in my life. I scanned the features of the gentleman opposite to whom I sat, and saw that his eyes were intently fixed upon me.

The discovery was anything but pleasant, for there was a dark malicious look in his face that I did not at all relish; so, quietly drawing a paper from my pocket, I became apparently absorbed in its contents, whilst from under my lids I kept a sharp eye upon the stranger. When I again turned to meet his eye I was more than ever convinced that he was bent upon mischief, though he had not spoken, for his hand was clutching nervously at something in the breast pocket of his coat, and his gaze was riveted upon me.

Was it a pistol he had in that pocket? I wondered. Such a thing was not at all unlikely; and, coupled with the fact that the man himself had every appearance of a maniac, my position was anything but agreeable, for we had a fifty minutes' run before us without a stoppage.

However, to have let him know my suspicions would but have been to place myself at a disadvantage; so, settling myself down for a nap, I so arranged my hat that I could watch his hand without his knowing it. No sooner had I apparently fallen asleep than he jumped from his seat with the evident intention of springing upon me; but, quick as he was, I was quicker, and in an instant I had him by the throat and hurled him on to his back. Before I could thoroughly master him he had turned the tables, and I was down upon the floor of the carriage with a madman sitting upon my chest.

All this occurred in a moment, and the first sound that reached my ear was a piercing scream from the lady whom I was about to arrest; but she did not faint, or I might not have lived to tell my story. With admirable presence of mind she stood watching for an opportunity to render me any aid she could.

Brave little woman! I wonder whether, if she had known that I had a pair of "bracelets" in my pocket intended as temporary ornaments for her wrists, she would have acted as she did.

But I am digressing. No sooner had the superior strength of the maniac stretched me upon my back than, clutching my throat with one hand, he drew a dagger from his breast with the other.

"Wretch," he hissed, rather than spoke, "do you suppose I am going to let a miserable scoundrel like you baffle me in a love affair? You've been following me long enough; but I'll stop it now!"

"No," I gasped; "you are really mistaken. It was nothing but chance that drew me in your road; and I don't even know who you are, whilst I do not seek to harm you."

I said this with the object of mollifying, and at the same time humoring him, if, as it appeared, he had been following him for any chance that might offer to free myself from his grasp.

"Liar!" he exclaimed. "Do you think I haven't seen you? Why, you have been a veritable shadow to me, dogging my steps everywhere; for I've been following her, and you've been watching me all the time! Presumptuous wretch, do you suppose she cares a fig for you? Look at her!"—and, to my surprise, he pointed to the third occupant of our compartment—"and say if a dog like you is worthy of such beauty as that! You are a mere commoner and ugly as sin, whilst I am a perfect Adonis and a peer of the realm! But—bah—I am not going to argue with such as you. See—I will give you a thorough ticket for the next world!" And in an instant he raised the dagger and prepared to strike.

But an unexpected movement on the part of the fair passenger caused my assailant to turn his head.

"Stay," she said—"I will help you! It will be such fun, you know. Listen! I'll count twenty, and while I am doing so you hold the dagger suspended over him, and when I come to nineteen, strike. But you must keep your eye fixed upon him, or he may struggle and balk you yet!"

Good Heaven, I thought, was she going to assist him, or was it only a ruse to gain time for me?

"Wait!" he cried, in turn interrupting her. "You are a good little woman, and I'll do as you say; but I must first get a firmer hold of him;" and tightening his grasp round my throat, he thrust his knee deep into my chest and bade her commence to count.

"Ready!" he cried, and once more he raised the dagger.

Then commenced what I thought was my death-knell. Slowly she began to count "One—two—three;" at the same time I cast an imploring glance at the woman who was thus assisting at my assassination, and who was standing behind my assailant, when, to my surprise, I noticed that she was stealthily removing her shawl and twisting it up rope fashion.

"Nine—ten—eleven"—by this time she had crept a step nearer, and, before "fifteen" was reached, the neck of my would-be assassin was encircled by the twisted shawl, and he himself dragged backwards, striking at the air.

The moment I was free I sprang to my feet, and seizing the madman's wrists, I was enabled, whilst my assistant tightened the shawl, to put on the handcuffs, but not till after a desperate struggle, accompanied by some nasty wounds from the dagger. Then I bound his ankles together with my handkerchief, which was a long one of the old-fashioned kind; but, as I had nothing with which to secure his elbows to his side, I deemed it imprudent to allow him to rise until such time as I had obtained further aid; so, sitting astride of him, I took charge of the shawl ends, just holding them sufficiently tight, as occasion required, to enable me to keep him down until the train rolled slowly into the terminus at London.

When the guard, by our cries for help, discovered our predicament, strong arms soon secured the madman and conveyed him to the waiting room, where, upon being searched we discovered, by means of his card-case, his name and address; and on inquiry it turned out that he had been for some time the inmate of a private asylum, but had recently made his escape.

Of course no time was lost, in conveying him thither; but the strangest part of the affair was his meeting and falling in love with the lady who was then being sought for by myself. And it was whilst silently admiring at a distance that he conceived the idea that I, who had also an interest in keeping her in sight, was dogging his steps.

Certainly he evinced remarkably good taste and a keen eye for a pretty face, for the fair one was by no means devoid of personal attractions though I think that had he known — But I forget myself. It is not my intention to say more than I can possibly help concerning the lady in question.

Did the "bracelets" afterward adorn her wrists, do you ask? Well, no. For, strange as it may seem, for some inexplicable reason I could never trace her after the dreadful affair in the train, and my earnest hope is that nothing more harsh than the trinkets sold at a jeweler's has ever rested upon her arms since that terrible fifty minutes' ride.

The hair is the covering of the roof of "the house of thought and palace of the soul." Where baldness, which sometimes occurs in quite young persons, is hereditary, it is doubtful if anything can be done to prevent or remedy it. Avoid "restoratives" and other nostrums, and, as a rule, do not use pomatums or oils upon the head.

A certain hair "balm" was very popular many years ago and did wonders, if the directions were followed. The "balm" was to be used night and morning, first rubbing the scalp with a stiff brush for five minutes before applying the stuff. The thorough use of a moderately stiff brush will greatly promote the health of the scalp and prevent the falling of the hair without a "balm" or other preparation. The hair should be occasionally washed, and if there is much dandruff, the yolk of an egg will be most efficient in removing it. Work the egg with the fingers well into the hair, a little at a time, to bring it in contact with the scalp; then wash it out thoroughly with water, and the hair will be beautifully clean and soft. Avoid all shampooing liquids; those used by barbers are strong potash solutions. They call it "Salts of Wormwood" and "Salts of Tartar," and use it without knowing its real nature. It is very effective in cleaning but ruinous to the hair. If the falling of the hair is not prevented by thorough brushing, some stimulation may be made. Cantharides is most commonly used. Half an ounce of the tincture of cantharides added to a quart of bay rum will answer better than most "hair tonics."

LUMBAGO is one of the back taxes that you can't readily supply a check for.

"Nine—ten—eleven"—by this time she had crept a step nearer, and, before "fifteen" was reached, the neck of my would-be assassin was encircled by the twisted shawl, and he himself dragged backwards, striking at the air.

The moment I was free I sprang to my feet, and seizing the madman's wrists, I was enabled, whilst my assistant tightened the shawl, to put on the handcuffs, but not till after a desperate struggle, accompanied by some nasty wounds from the dagger. Then I bound his ankles together with my handkerchief, which was a long one of the old-fashioned kind; but, as I had nothing with which to secure his elbows to his side, I deemed it imprudent to allow him to rise until such time as I had obtained further aid; so, sitting astride of him, I took charge of the shawl ends, just holding them sufficiently tight, as occasion required, to enable me to keep him down until the train rolled slowly into the terminus at London.

When the guard, by our cries for help, discovered our predicament, strong arms soon secured the madman and conveyed him to the waiting room, where, upon being searched we discovered, by means of his card-case, his name and address; and on inquiry it turned out that he had been for some time the inmate of a private asylum, but had recently made his escape.

Of course no time was lost, in conveying him thither; but the strangest part of the affair was his meeting and falling in love with the lady who was then being sought for by myself. And it was whilst silently admiring at a distance that he conceived the idea that I, who had also an interest in keeping her in sight, was dogging his steps.

Certainly he evinced remarkably good taste and a keen eye for a pretty face, for the fair one was by no means devoid of personal attractions though I think that had he known — But I forget myself. It is not my intention to say more than I can possibly help

EXPLANATION.

Above is a skeleton map of Frederick county in which the railroads are denoted by continuous lines and the districts by dotted or broken lines.

A Through Railroad.

We take the following from The News of Frederick for last Monday:

For some time past it has been known that the directors of the newly constructed Gettysburg and Harrisburg railroad have been looking for a southern route for their road, which at present ends "in the air" at Round Top. Acting on this impression, Colonel Fuller of Gettysburg has had several interviews with Mr. James A. Elder, president of the Emmitsburg railroad, with a view to the union of the two lines. At present these are separated by a tract of open country about six miles in length, and it is estimated that the connecting link could be constructed for about $80,000 or $90,000. This would have a great value in developing resources and reducing freight expenses in both towns, and it would also give Gettysburg easier communication with most points in Western Maryland than it at present possesses. We are assured that both Gettysburg and Emmitsburg are fully alive to the benefits to be derived from such a connection, but both roads are new enterprises and the capital required is prohibitory. Meanwhile the Gettysburg road, growing impatient, is seeking a south-eastern outlet via Westminister, which is on an air line from Gettysburg to Baltimore and Washington. As every one knows, the old route via Hanover Junction and Emory Grove is not only circuitous but it is not possible, with the existing train service, to get to Gettysburg and back in the same day, unless the visitor can rush all his business through in half an hour. At the same time it is reasonable to believe that an extension of the Gettysburg and Harrisburg road due south via Emmitsburg, Rocky Ridge, Woodsboro, Frederick and Point of Rocks to the Potomac and Harper's Ferry would be of infinitely greater advantage to the Adams County town in the near future than the route via Westminister. Moreover from Point of Rocks there are express trains at frequent intervals over the Metropolitan branch of the B. & O., by which Washington can be reached in a little over an hour. Assuming that close connection could be obtained at Frederick, there is no reason whatever why a through service between Gettysburg and Washington should not be obtainable in three hours. Apart from this, such a line would bring about a great development of the agricultural resources of those districts of Frederick county, which at present are unimproved, and through railroad accommodation. Mr. James A. Elder, president of the Emmitsburg railroad, said to a News representative, recently, that the project of a southern outlet from Gettysburg via Emmitsburg and Frederick was perfectly feasible and could be accomplished at small cost.

The advantages of such a road are at once apparent, when it is considered that Frederick, so much further South than we are, now pays but $8 per ton for the same coal that we pay $5.55 for.

Indian Visit. A party of about thirty Indians visited the Gettysburg battlefield on Friday. There were seven chiefs and four squaws of the Arapahoe and Cheyenne tribes, in Indian costumes, with their interpreter Ed Guerrier, the rest being children from the Carlisle Indian School. They were taken to Round-Top and other points in carriages, W. D. Holtzworth explaining everything through the interpreter. They seemed greatly surprised at the extent and duration of the battle and the immense loss of life; and were much pleased with a picture taken of the group at Devil's Den by Wm. H. Tipton. They dined at the Eagle Hotel and left in the afternoon train for Carlisle. The hotel register has the following names: Powder Face, Left Hand and Squaw, White Bear, One-Eye-Antelope, Big Jake, White Wind and Squaw Old Crow, Cloud Chief, Red Wolf, Black Wolf and Squaw, Left Hand Squaw and Yellow Bear, with young Powder-Faces, young Yellow Bears, Red Wolves and so on, the names of the latter written by themselves in fairly legible hands. The chiefs industriously smoked cigarettes, and occasionally indulged in a smile over it.—Compiler.

On Monday night the hardware store of Mr. Joseph L. Routhahn, corner of Market and Third streets, was entered by thieves and about $50 worth of pistols and knives stolen. It is thought the thieves gained an entrance through the transom over the door on Third street. The key was in the lock of this door, which was found open in the morning. Mr. Routhahn can congratulate himself that the loss of articles is not more than what is mentioned above.

Dr. Steiner, of Maryland, says the Boston Daily Advertiser, of the 22d ult., the gentleman interested by Mr. Enoch Pratt, of Baltimore, with the development of his magnificent gift of a public library to that city, has been in town for several days, inspecting the various libraries of Boston. He visited Cambridge yesterday and had a conference with Mr. Justin Winsor, the librarian of Harvard College. He is accompanied by Mr. McCoy, one of the board of management of the Peabody Institute, of which Mr. Pratt is treasurer, and who is also intrusted with the responsibilities of the new enterprise. It may not be generally known that Mr. Pratt himself, who has shown such princely liberality in his foundation of a public library for Baltimore, was at one time in business in this city.

Advent.

Last Sunday was the First Sunday in Advent. The day marks the beginning of the Ecclesiastical, as January does the civil, year. The season includes the four Sundays preceding Christmas, and is preparatory to that time of universal joy and gratitude for the birth of the Saviour of mankind, as well as the time when the church specially contemplates His second coming to judge the world, and the consummation of all things. It is the season of penitential exercises that prepare His followers to hail His coming with the glad cry, "Hosanna to the Son of David! Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord." The Sacred Scriptures everywhere emphasize the second Advent—the time of our bodily dissolution seems to stand along with the other necessary processes of nature, and is not specially estimated as momentous, and therefore the final return of the Lord is the object of all faith and hope.

The Frederick News has been exercised about the want of enterprise on the part of that ancient city, and contrasts its state with that of Hagerstown and other neighboring places, with the advantage in favor of the latter. The difference is attributed to the interest manifested by the other places in giving encouragement to railway service in every direction. Hagerstown stands forth conspicuously in this direction. We rather think the growing greatness of that place has come not from the native choice, but has been thrust upon the people, simply because the locality invited an occupation that could not be avoided. Frederick was designed to be a thing apart in this world; lovely in situation, the abode of such persons as have the means to retire from the busy scenes of the world's conflicts, and live in peace amid plenty, undisturbed by the turmoils of its restless hordes. The Baltimore and Ohio railroad left her with the connection of a switch some miles distant from its main stem. Her Pennsylvania connection leads to the interior, and that does not look to expansion. The tradition is that the original survey for the Baltimore and Ohio road was made to pass near Emmitsburg, as was the case of the Western Maryland road, but the influence of Elliott's Mills and Frederick made the diversion in which the latter place could at last be reached, only as before stated. The News has struck the key note on the scale of advance in the article we have elsewhere reproduced, for the railroad from Gettysburg to Frederick and on to Washington. The conception of the scheme is from sources that view situations with expanded interest in future needs. To give it life and efficiency we claim a wide-awake activity which we greatly fear will be slow in developing itself in Frederick City.
