THE LIBERTY BELL.

BY E. S. BROOKS.

Squarely prim and stoutly built, Free from glitter and from gilt, Plain—from lintel up to roof tree and to belfry bare and brown—

Stands the bell that hot July— While the folk throng anxious by— Where the Continental Congress meets within the Quaker town.

Hark! a stir, a sudden shout, And a boy comes rushing out, Signaling to where his grandsire in the belfry, waiting stands;

"Ring!" he cries; "the deed is done! Ring! they've signed, and freedom's won!"

And the ringer grasps the bell rope with his strong and sturdy hands;

While the bell, with joyous note Clanging from its brazen throat, Rings the tidings, all exultant—peals the news to shore and sea:

"Man is man—a slave no longer; Truth and Right than Might are stronger.

Praise to God! We're free; we're free!"

In Peril

A Thrilling Adventure at a Signal Service Station.

Ten miles to the hotel and an hour's climb after that," said Walter Gray thoughtfully. "We shall be back before nine o'clock tomorrow night."

"It won't take us so long coming home," suggested Harry Power. "We fellows scrambled down on the ledges last summer in fifteen minutes, while it took the rest of the party an hour to come by the path."

"You haven't blown to any of the fellows?"

"Of course not," returned Harry, indignantly. "Not a soul at the Academy knows. Where's the grub?"

The "grub" in question consisted of hard crackers, a couple of boxes of sardines, half a dozen lemons and two sheets of buns, gray of hue and shiny of surface that had been purchased at the bake-shop that found its chief patronage amongst the boys of Eaton Academy.

"We may as well put in the rest of the hard tack," said Harry opening his knapsack again. "I was hungry enough last summer to have eaten the rocks and thirsty enough to have drained the river dry."

"How good the lemonade at the station tasted!" added Walter.

"At fifteen cents a glass, sold to all the people that climbed the mountain, the Signal Service men might soon retire on a fortune," suggested Harry. "Shall we need the blankets?"

"The men are probably not expecting visitors and if a November night is cold in proportion to a July noon a couple of extra blankets won't be amiss," answered Walter, prudently.

"One would think you were preparing for an expedition to the North Pole!" jeered Harry.

"We had better turn in if we mean to awake at 4 o'clock to-morrow morning," said Walter, with a yawn.

"You will have to do the waking. Ho, for the North Pole! Good night Captain Kane."

"Good night, Sir John."

It was long before light the next morning when the two boys stole from the house. Harry, although still yawning, kept in advance of his companion as they tramped along the road, out of the village and into the open country. Now and then the stillness was broken by the bark of a shepherd dog at some solitary farm house till fields had given place to meadow and woodland. It was a bright, clear morning with a touch of frost in the air, and as the first tints of sunrise tinged the horizon, Harry gave vent to his satisfaction in a shout and the exclamation:

"Race you to the blacksmith's!"

"Race you to the blacksmith's!" and off the two boys started down the long incline and over the culvert that spanned the road at the entrance to a hamlet lying at the foot of a cluster of hills, upon one of which Eaton Academy was situated and upon the summit of another, whose attitude merited the distinction of "mountain," the Signal Service Station was located, that was the object of the boys' present expedition.

Far up the mountain side was a hotel, reached by a road that wound through a series of woodland vistas or extended views over the valley. From this point the climb proper began, leading through a pasture and then following a path that led upward by an inclined plane in the form of a double S. Notwithstanding the freshets that yearly washed away portions of the soil or brought fresh accumulations of earth and rocks and underbrush, this road was kept in fairly good condition by the exigencies of the summer tourists.

Stopping only long enough on the piazza of the great deserted white building to eat their luncheon, the boys set out for the summer, resting again midway of the ascent at the spring, whose brink was worn smooth by many feet.

The final tug tried even their hardy muscles, for the last part of the way led over rocks worn to glassy smoothness, over which one must clamber either by the aid of crevices, that zigzag over the surface, or now and again pulling himself up by means of a stunted growth of blueberry bushes. Just below the summit on the other side, where a hollow afforded some protection against the furious winds, the station was fastened to the rocks by staples and huge iron chains.

Harry had gained the highest point and turned to give a triumphant shout. The next moment Walter saw him totter and sink to the ground.

"My foot slipped on that confounded rock and then caught in a crack," he responded to his friend's anxious query, making an effort to stand. "It's no go. Something is wrong with my ankle," said he, sitting down again and looking ruefully at his foot.

"Take my arm. It's only a few steps farther," urged Walter.

But the effort to stand was futile. "I'm afraid it's a sprain," said Harry, anxiously.

"Maybe it isn't as bad as that. Anyway, we can stay at the station till you are all right," returned Walter, cheerily. "I'll run on and get the men to give us a lift."

It was some time before he returned, and then, in tones that he tried to make easy and unconcerned said:

"Folks aren't at home. In fact, from the looks of things, I'm afraid they're gone for good—retired on the fortune we predicted, probably."

"Here's a pretty fix!"

"We can sleep there to-night, and to-morrow I will get help from below. Put your arm around my neck, Harry. I'll come back for the blankets and grab."

The door of the station was fastened, and the boys entered what had evidently been the living room. Chairs, a table and a stove, with a rusty iron kettle, comprised the furniture. A small room adjoining contained two narrow iron beds, with the mattresses remaining, but without cover-lids.

Further investigation revealed a cupboard containing a pack of cards, a lamp with the oil burnt low, a small quantity of tea in an old mustard can and a copy of a New York paper bearing a date of six weeks before. There was a large closet opening from this room in which was a small quantity of coal, a hatchet and a snowshovel.

Walter brought one of the beds into the larger room, and after making Harry as comfortable as possible, kindled a fire. Beneath its influence the spirits of the two boys revived. Hot-water bandages—they had refilled their canteens at the spring—reduced the pain of the injured ankle, and the November day drawing to a close, the lamp was lighted and supper, consisting of the last of the sardines and beans, was devoured. For drink, slices of lemon gave flavor to their tea.

Later in the evening the thirst induced by their meal was allayed by lemons, the supply of water having been exhausted.

"Let's turn in," suggested Walter. "We shall see the sun rise anyway."

Morning came, and long before the sun was visible, even at that elevation, Walter was awakened by the cold. The fire had burnt low and the wind was howling about the station, coming in gusts against the window-panes with a sound that meant what?

He arose, lighted the lamp, which was already burning dim, put more coal on the fire, and, with a sinking heart, unbarred the outer of the two doors. The force of the wind made him stagger.

"What's up?" demanded Harry, drowsily.

"It is snowing," returned Walter, quietly.

"What shall we do?" Harry aroused himself sufficiently to exclaim.

"Wait till morning. It is early in the season for a heavy storm," answered Walter, but his heart did not lighten with the hopeful suggestion. At their altitude ordinary weather probabilities could not be relied upon, and some of the heaviest storms had been known to fall in New Hampshire in November.

Morning revealed a driving snow-storm that, descending in almost a solid mass, shut even the nearest rocks from view. It was drifting, too, and long before noon, despite Walter's efforts to keep the space before the door clear, the snow had risen to above half its height and he threw down the shovel in despair.

They had now, however, a supply of water, and a continued application of bandages materially reduced the swelling of Harry's ankle. Dinner time came.

"We had better go on short rations," suggested Walter. "If the storm lasts it may be some time—he did not finish the sentence.

"I never thought there was much fun in being an Arctic explorer," said Harry, trying to speak with his accustomed lightness. "Have the dogs been fed? Are there any polar bears or walrus within sight? When do you think a relief expedition will be organized for us?"

"No one knows where we are," answered Walter, gravely.

Night came and they made their supper on tea and two crackers apiece. The lamp, after a flicker or two, went out, leaving an ill odor and adding darkness to the dreary sense of isolation that was beginning to be keenly felt.

The partially open door of the stove gave out a faint ruddy glow, revealing Harry reclining on the bed and Walter sitting in one of the straight-backed wooden chairs with his elbows resting on his knees and his chin supported on his hands gazing into the fire. There was scarcely enough coal to last another day and the storm was still raging.

By the next morning the snow had drifted over the door and windows. It was no doubt a fortunate thing, as it afforded protection from the cold, but the temperature had fallen both without and within. Walter spent a part of the day in knocking the chairs to pieces for firewood.

The next morning the last crumbs of the crackers were eaten and the two boys sat looking at each other in silence. The heavy drifts must already have made the path impassable. Harry broke down and sobbed audibly. That day the cupboard door and shelves were burnt.

Already the pangs of hunger were felt in vertigo and cramps. For the last twenty-four hours dry tea-leaves had been their only sustenance. The snow had ceased to fall, but the gale made a whirlwind of icy particles that it would have been impossible to breast. The horror of darkness was added to that of cold and hunger and thirst.

A match struck at intervals showed them the hands of their watches, and they knew when night had once more succeeded day.

The noonday sun seemed to give not a particle of warmth and the high wind still continued. That day, too, came to its long end.

Hunger, as manifested in the pain of the first twenty-four hours, had ceased to be felt, but its results were apparent in their growing weakness. Their greatest suffering was from thirst. The heat of the room was not sufficient to melt the snow and when, in their desire for drink, they put the icy particles in their mouths, their tongues and lips were burnt as with caustic.

One of the narrow mattresses had been ripped open into which Harry had crawled. The other mattress and one blanket were used as coverlets. Walter, enveloped in the other blanket, strove to keep up his circulation by running up and down, by gymnastic exercises and by dancing jigs. Once he laughed aloud in the midst of some unaccountable performance, and then was assailed by a terrible fear that he was going mad, as he had read of men's "doing in extremity of danger.

He forced himself to declaim "all the poetry he knew, partly to convince himself that he was still sane, partly as another device to keep awake, but notwithstanding all his efforts, the drowsiness that was not healthful nature's assailed him overpoweringly. More than once he ran into the bed, or found himself staggering in a circle like a drunken man.

Alone he would probably have succumbed, but the thought of his helpless companion nerved him to the struggle till the last match, struck with difficulty by his icy fingers, showed him that the terrible Arctic night was at an end.

He fancied that the wind had abated and the temperature had somewhat modified. By means of the two beds, one placed upon the other, he reached the aperture in the ceiling that gave access to a small loft. The window at one end, broken open, gave him the first outlook for four days into freedom. In the immediate vicinity the snow lay in irregular mounds and ridges, and having been of a dense, moist character, had been packed by the succeeding cold into a solid mass.

After telling Harry of his project Walter crowded himself through the window. Their one hope of escape lay in finding the opening to the precipitous path over the ledge, and if, sheltered by the woods, the snow lay there in a sufficiently low surface, the short cut down the mountain might be used as a toboggan.

The quarter of a mile between the summit and the woods was the longest that Walter Gay ever traversed. Every step must be sounded with his climbing pole, for after the surface of the snow had become encrusted fine icy particles had been blown into the hollows between the rocks or drifts, to step into which meant perhaps sinking to his neck. The hatchet came repeatedly into use in cutting steps on some glittering incline.

The familiar landmarks had been obliterated and it seemed an eternity to Harry before the shrill whistle sounded that told him his companion had at last found the ledge path.

By the middle of the afternoon Walter appeared again at the station and the boys started. The second journey was even more difficult than the first, as Harry's steps must be supported. More than once he sank upon the snow, declaring in despair that he could go no farther. The door that was to serve as a rude toboggan was now thrown down and allowed to slide before them. The sun was low when they at last reached their goal.

"We shall be dashed to pieces!" said Harry, despairingly, peering at the declivity. "There is one place where there is an abrupt descent of twelve feet. We shall be thrown off there, even if we have not been long before, or knocked off by the overhanging branches."

Walter made no reply. With the cordage of the beds he was strapping the blankets to the door in such a manner as to provide a sort of hood, designed to keep them on their rude craft.

At last all was ready. Crouching upon the novel conveyance, the boys, warned by experience, threw deep, long breaths.

Walter let go his hold upon a young spruce and the toboggan shot forward, soon gaining impetus

"Let the kettle to the trumpet speak. The trumpet to the cannon without. The cannon to the heavens, the heaven to earth."

Once more the day has dawned upon the anniversary of what should be to Americans the most patriotically remembered event in our country's history—the occasion of the birth of our great Republic.

But, while the presence of such innate feeling is undeniable, we cannot fail to notice each year the milder form of its expression among our people.

For, the practical having always been the mainstay of our ancestors' ideas, we need only refer to the admixture of the English, German and Swedish increase in our citizenship to account for our growing avoidance of any inordinate ebullition of feelings.

Yet, to prevent the stagnation of our energies, we have but to turn to our amusements to find the necessary leaven of the Irish, French and Italian blood tingling through our veins.

And yet, while there is danger even in this to be avoided. This progress of which we boast is the satisfying result of additional energy and activity, increase of brain work as well as physical exertion.

Let us then, at such times as these, suspend the duties and cares of daily life, to look about us and enjoy the good things that God has provided for His children.

THE FESTIVAL OPENED.

A Brilliant and Promising Beginning.—Guardian Hose Company wins new Laurels.

The Firemen's Fair and Festival opened on Wednesday evening. The room is tastefully decorated with flags and evergreens, and good things meet one's gaze on all sides upon entering the hall. Confectionery, cakes and fruits are abundantly displayed and the tables tastefully adorned with flowers, while numerous fancy articles attract attention both by their elegance and the taste with which they are arranged.

The Guardian Hose Company of Mechanicstown arrived early in the evening, and was escorted by the Vigilant Hose Company from Firemen's Hall to the festival building, headed by the Emmitt Cornet Band, the two bodies of uniformed men making a fine appearance as they marched up the street. The visitors went through an intricate and artistic drill, executing a number of beautiful movements which were loudly cheered by the crowd of bystanders, which, owing to the previous announcements made through these columns, was unusually large. Whilst regretting our inability to describe the different movements, we must state that the thorough discipline and undivided attention which Capt. Stokes has instilled into the members of the company reflect credit not only upon him, but also upon his men, and the town they represent. Come again boys, we are always glad to see you.

FOURTH OF JULY CELEBRATION.

Brilliant Observance of the Day.—Grand Parade.—Positions of the Various Organizations.—Order of March, etc.

The observance of the Fourth of July to-day will be far ahead of any held here for a number of years, not excepting that of 1876. The day will be generally observed as a holiday, and the Firemen's Fair and Festival will be the principal attraction, while the grand parade in the evening is looked forward to as the crowning event of the day.

FORMATION OF PARADE.

The parade will form in front of the Firemen's Hall, on Carlisle street, at 6 o'clock in the following order: Chief Marshal and Staff, Emmitt Cornet Band, Vigilant Hose Company, Mt. St. Mary's Benevolent Association, Emerald Beneficial Association, Arthur Post, No. 41, G. A. R., Sons of Veterans of Emmitsburg, Maj. Starr Camp No. 268, Sons of Veterans of Fairfield, Massachusetts Tribe No. 41, I. O. R. M., Union Bridge Band and Union Bridge Fire Company.

THE ORDER OF MARCH will be from Carlisle street to Green, down Green to Federal, Federal to Main street, up Main street to the West End and counter marching will return down Main street to the hall in which the festival is held, where an address of welcome will be delivered by Jeremiah O'Donoghue, Esq., vice-president of Vigilant Hose Company, after which the parade will disband.

Extensive preparations have been made for the entertainment of the visitors, and the authorities will see that perfect order is maintained and all rowdyism prevented.

Miss Hattie Baker of Mt. Pleasant, charged by a coroner's jury with infanticide, was committed to jail at Frederick last Saturday to await the action of the grand jury. She has since been released on $1,000 bail.

Etchison and C. O. Keedy, trustees, to Cornelius Virts lot, etc., in Brunswick, $500. Frederick K. Stone and wife, et al., to John H. and Martin L. Shankle, 2 acres and 8 square perches, $256.25.

Ger well and stay well. But how shall we do it? Listen my friend, and the secret I'll tell. Though, for that matter, there's no secret to it, As many a man understands very well. If you're low-spirited, gloomy, depressed, If nothing tastes good and your nights bring no rest, If your stomach is foul and your mouth seems much foul, And so cross you become that they call you a "growler," Be sure that the trouble is due to your liver.

And the blood is as sluggish as sometimes a river Becomes when it's filled with all manner of stuff. Clear 't it out and the current runs smoothly enough. Go to the drug store and get a bottle of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, the great blood-purifier and liver invigorator. It is a sure cure for the low spirits and general depression a man feels when his liver is inactive and his blood impure. This remedy makes a man well, has been going up for the far West for a good many years. But the cry is not for pale, haggard, debilitated women. The pushing Western men are not anxious for beauty, but they need healthy wives. A great cry for health is continually going up from thousands of women, young and old, all over the earth. Countless remedies have appeared in answer. A few have succeeded, and none hold a higher place than Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, a sure cure for all those peculiar "weaknesses" and distressing ailments, peculiar to the sex.

Disinfectant Herb. It was discovered by Aunt Rachel Speer, over 50 years ago, that a plant, used in Holland for centuries, for curing consumption is found growing in some place in this country. This with other Herbs, combined with Powdered Blossoms that contain the aroma, for curing lung complaint, and at same time that is so obnoxious to the germ or microbes of contagious disease as to dispel them from the air in front of the face before it is breathed in the lungs. They last for years. Herb Pad Co., Passaic, N. J.

Infernal Ingenuity. Could scarcely devise more execrating tortures than those of which you see the evidences in the face of a rheumatic or neuralgic sufferer. The agonies are the consequence of not checking a rheumatic or neuralgic attack at the onset. Hostetter's Stomach Bitters has been found by skillful medical practitioners to possess not only remedial, but defensive efficacy, where those diseases exist, or a tendency to them is exhibited. Surely this pleasant but safe boric acid medicine, bearing the most high specific sanction, is better than the poisons often administered, but not more, not only in contending with the inflamed state of the system, and allaying the pain, but in dispelling the disease, and restoring the system to its normal condition. COMMITTED FOR THE ACTION OF THE GRAND JURY.

Frank Woodyard returned to Fort Gaver, after an Amusing Trial, at which some of the Witnesses Lose their Tempers and the Counsel for the Defense his Dignity.

As announced in these columns last week, Frank Woodyard, colored, was arraigned before Justice Stokes on Wednesday, to answer to two charges: of carrying concealed weapons and murdering assault on the person of Oliver E. Horner, committed on the night of June 14th ult. After hearing the evidence of a number of witnesses, and summing up the case by counsel for the defense, Justice Stokes committed Frank for the action of the grand jury, in default of $200 in one case and $300 in the other.

The evidence, as brought out in the case, showed that on the night referred to, Woodyard started a disturbance in front of Michael Hoke's saloon, by swinging a screen door back and forth against the house, and when ordered by Mr. Hoke to desist became insolent and abusive. That, although warned not to come on the pavement, he persisted in doing so, whereupon Hoke struck him and Woodyard cut Horner, the nearest man to him, with a knife or razor.

Woodyard was defended by a lawyer from Frederick named Pampel, who stated to a representative of this paper when asked for his Christian name, that he had none! This eminent (?) attorney, being the only member of the profession present, at once conceived the brilliant idea that he was counsel both for the State and defense in turn, as well as judge and jury. In his cross-examinations, he charged all the witnesses for the State with having been drunk, a conclusion evidently drawn from the association of the statement with his own present feelings. For unprofessional conduct, want of dignity and downright impudence, the attorney named stands after this exhibition without a rival. Several times the witnesses felt forced to give him impudent answers, and the Justice to demand "order in the Court room," addressed directly to him; but the climax was not reached until his attorneyship opened the argument of the case, which we presume will be continued when he gets sober or Justice Stokes makes up his mind to hear further from him. He then called attention to the fact that one of the witnesses had said that he (Pampel) was drunk, and stated that even if he was, he had more brains than all his audience combined. This assertion was a great relief to those present, explaining at once the cause of "swelled head" exhibited by him all through the proceedings, and also convincing them that they had formed a wrong impression in regard to the cause of his head inclining to one side or the other, or at times drooping forward. Who can conceive the mammoth proportions of cranium, containing as stately, more brains than those of fifty ordinary men, combined! Who can wonder that his working resulted in somewhat mixed expressions, that the bearer of such a burden should have appeared weary, and instead of returning to Frederick on the 3 o'clock train with the rest of the party, decided to rest (we nearly said so!) his weary head, before attempting the long and tedious journey from Emmitsburg to the county seat? That this wonderful cranium—of the contents of which he boasts so highly—was not relieved of a portion of its outside coating, is due to the influence exerted by disinterested persons over one of the witnesses in the case. The desire to render this unpleasant service to the lawyer's head was brought about by a point blank statement that the witness in question had sworn to a lie. We can only trust that this man may either learn to act with more propriety in the future of stay at home, and the latter will be far preferable to the citizens of our community.

The Great Benefit.

Which people in run down state of health derive from Hood's Sarsaparilla conclusively proves that this medicine "makes the weak strong." It does not act like a stimulant, imparting fictitious strength, but Hood's Sarsaparilla builds up in a perfectly natural way all the weakened parts, purifies the blood, and assists to healthy action those important organs, the kidneys and liver.

Interesting Wedding at St. Vincent's.

Miss Anna Guise, of the Girls' Home, on North Front street, was married yesterday at St. Vincent's Church to Mr. Anthony Stracke. Nuptial mass was celebrated by the Rev. E. Didier, Prof. Melton played the chimes. The church was crowded, and all the girls of the Home were present to wish the couple long life and happiness.—Sun.

Mr. David Guise, of this vicinity, a brother of the bride, attended the wedding.

Mother's Station Items.

Mr. John P. Seabold made a visit to Mechanicstown.

Mr. J. C. Rosensteel made a trip to Baltimore.

Mr. John Bookner, of Baltimore, is visiting at Mr. S. Walter's.

Wedding Bells.

A more ideal wedding day never dawned than last Thursday morning, when Mr. Chas. N. Baker, of Emmitsburg, led to the altar Miss Jennie M. Felix, second daughter of Mr. Frank Felix, of this vicinity.

It was just six o'clock when the sweet strains of Mendelssohn's march announced the arrival of the bridal party. Very sweet and charming the young bride looked as, leaning on the arm of the groom-elect, she walked slowly down the aisle and took her stand at the chancel railing. The bright June sunshine, streaming through the stained glass windows, spread like a halo about the happy couple, while the solemn vows were being taken.

The bridal dress was of creamy albastro made L'Empire, tastefully and delicately combined with moire silk. Her ornaments were the ideal flowers, orange blossoms, which confined the snowy bridal veil, which enveloped the petite figure like a cloud, while a tiny gold chain from which depended a turquoise heart was worn about her throat. In her hand she carried a beautiful prayer-book of white vellum and gold.

Immediately following the bride and groom walked the bridesmaid and groomsmen, the former being the charming and accomplished daughter of Mr. Geo. W. Dove of Washington, D. C., and the latter being Mr. David Guise, of Emmitsburg. The bridesmaid's dress was a combination gown of ivory white cashmere and moire silk. The bodice was cut V shape and the opening filled in with creamy lace, which fell in soft cascades to the edge of the waist.

About her throat she wore a magnificent pendant, encircled with diamonds, while a superb bouquet of La France roses and smilax, carried in the hand, completed this most tasteful toilette.

After the ceremony, the party were shown to seats within the chancel railing and, at the conclusion of the high nuptial mass which followed, they were driven to the home of the groom, where a sumptuous wedding breakfast was served. At 8:20 the happy couple took the train for Baltimore, Washington and other points south.

Mr. and Mrs. Baker returned last Tuesday evening, when a reception was tendered their many friends at "Killdeer," the home of the bride. The long and beautifully heaped refreshment table was spread in the dining-room, and presented a most beautiful appearance, the central feature being an immense wedding-cake, which rested on a bed of delicate maiden-hair fern. The presents, which were numerous and costly, were displayed in an inner room, and excited the admiration of all. The popularity of the bride was attested not only by the handsome way in which she was remembered by her friends in this vicinity, but also by the many presents received from her friends in Washington and Baltimore, and it is with heartfelt best wishes that we leave the young couple to their future life of wedded bliss. A Great Cry for More Women It has been going up for the far West for a good many years. But the cry is not for pale, haggard, debilitated women. The pushing Western men are not anxious for beauty, but they need healthy wives. A great cry for health is continually going up from thousands of women, young and old, all over the earth. Countless remedies have appeared in answer. A few have succeeded, and none hold a higher place than Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription, a sure cure for all those peculiar "weaknesses" and distressing ailments, peculiar to the sex.
