DELIGHT'S AND WOES OF NAPLES.

Where the Beggars, Donkey Boys and

Other Rogues Are All Pervading. About Sorrento there is something of a Neapolitan flavor in the air. The Neapolitan small boy is half monkey, half comedian and half thief, and here, as elsewhere, the boy is father to the man. In Sorrento there is the municipal band, more inexorable in Italy than death itself. There are the little companies of men and women who dance the tarantella in costume on the terraces of the hotels and sing vulgar songs, which the foreigner takes for national airs.

There are not indeed so many beggars as in Naples itself and its vicinity, but the perpetual attempt to extract small coin from the visitor occupies the sole and undivided attention of at least one portion of the population. Here, as in Naples, the guide guides not, but chatters, butchering what he supposes to be the foreigner's language in order to make himself a holiday. Here, as elsewhere, the lively donkey boy twists the patient ass' tail, ultimately requests you to dismount at the steep places and gets on himself. Here, as in all southern Italy, the small deceptions of a very poor and not very clever people bring a smile to the keen but often good natured northerner's face.

All this I might describe at endless length had it not been done so often, and in one or two instances so well. There it all is, more or less lovely as to its surroundings, more or less modern in its buildings, more or less civilized by the people that move upon the scene. And below it and before it and facing it stretches the sea, the eternal, ever changing, ever abiding sea.

with God's own palette, trasting with that broad water wherein are mingled the precious things of day and night, the maiden rose mellow of dawn and the gorgeous purple of imperial evening, the gold of the sun, and the silver of the moon, and the precious stones of the stars, all blending at last in the depths of the great liquid sapphire of that sea which wise men of old believed to be the source of all living things.--Century.

Starting Locomotive Fires.

A quarter of a cent is a very small sum in itself, but when multiplied enough times the product is considerable, a fact which railway managers thoroughly understand. A saving of only 1 mill a day in the running of a locomotive amounts to 364 cents in a year, and with several thousand locomotives the saving is considerable. The good superintendent today is the man who makes these little savings, and the number of ways in which they are done is astonishing. Take the matter of starting a fire, for example. Most locomotives are fired up with wood, and about an eighth of a cord is necessary to start a good blaze.

Wood is pretty expensive fuel to use for such purposes, and several railways have begun to substitute oil for it. The oil is stored in a reservoir outside the roundhouse, and is forced by compressed air through a Feries of fixed pipes to flexible pipes pear each locomotive stall. When it is necessary to start a fire, a bed of coal is spread over the grate, some old waste thrown on top of it and lighted, and then the oil is sprayed into the firebox through the flexible pipes by the compressed air. It takes just about as long to start a fire with this apparatus as with wood, but with the former the cost is only 25 cents, while with wood it ranges from 11 to 35 cents.-St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Disappearance of the "Old Salt."

The typical "old salt," who uses strange oaths, wears a long knife in his belt and hitches up his trousers, is fast dving out, but he will not be missed in the navy, for there is no further need of him. The fashions of the sea, like the fashions of the land, have changed, and the sailors of the future must be machinists, carpenters and boatswains, sailmakers and masters. Even the guns are handled by machinery, and even the lights at the topmast and in the bows are lighted by touching a button. night, put the mule in the stable and The condition of men-of-warsmen is so changed that one-third-perhaps one-half-of the crew of such ships as the Columbia, or the New York, or the Minneapolis are employed below in the engine and boiler rooms; while the ordinary sailor has nothing to do but to swab the decks and keep the brasswork shining.
